Past Wars Cruelly Waged Says Dickinson

By Associated Press.

West Point, N. Y., June 15.—Our past wars were cruelly waged compared with what war would be now, said Secretary of War Dickinson today in an address to the graduating class at the United States Military Academy. "Specialization and technique," the secretary declared, "are demanded in military affairs as inexorably as in art, manufacture, commerce, transportation, education, medicine, law, and indeed in every department of human activity."

"We have come into the international limelight and have assumed the responsibilities of a first class power. If we should engage in hostilities with any nation of respectable strength the clash would be quick and stupendous. Our commanders, unless the war shall endure long enough to forge out of crude metal thunderbolts of war, must already have been trained in a way that surpasses all conceptions of military education entertained a quarter of a century back. From these conditions, we may expect, if we shall have wars, that men trained in the school of the soldier will be in the future, and perhaps even more than they have in the past, potential both in our military and civil administration. What, therefore, should more profoundly engage our care than the education of those who more certainly than any other class of our citizens of equal number will affect our national life? "This day, that makes such an eventful period in the careers of so many who will be in line for leadership of our armies and perhaps high civic officers, does not pass unheeded by the American people. Our army and navy schools are looked to with pride and inspire hope. These sentiments are fully justified by what these great institutions have done for the nation. With them are linked the names of many whose fame is a priceless heritage to our people."

"The histories of countries deal largely with the record of their wars," said Secretary Dickinson in opening his address. "Like a self-registering thermometer, they seem to record the highest and lowest stages of excellence the elements that constitute vigorous national life. All that is good and all that is bad are revealed in the crucial test of war that taxes to their limit the resources of a people."

"It is not unjust to estimate a people by the qualities displayed by their military chieftains, not merely in war but within the sphere of influence occupied by them in consequence of military leadership. Judged by this standard, the American people have experienced exceptional felicity. Every great war in which we were engaged revealed generals of exceptional ability and character. Each has been followed by the immediate elevation of a military hero to the highest office. It is the unparalleled glory of our country that, unseduced by the temptations afforded by their military renown, their hold upon the popular affections and the blinding incense offered up by flatterers, they hold the military in subjection to civil authority, and returned to the people, their high trust unsullied by any public or private act that could alarm them for the safety of their institutions or bring them national shame."

"The war of the revolution elevated to the presidency Washington, that of 1812 Jackson, that with Mexico Taylor, that between the states Grant, and that with Spain Roosevelt."

"Where will you find in the history of any people such a record of private and public virtue as has been shown by our military men who have held the chief magistracy? Their fortune was exceptional, but not their qualities among the soldiers of whom they were exponents. There must be an apex to every pyramid, but because it is highest it does not necessarily differ in essentials from that by which it is sustained. There were many others in all of these wars who discharged great trusts with exceptional abilities, who had the highest qualities of manhood, who, though less conspicuously, acted their part during and after hostilities just as patriotically, and bore with honor high civic trusts to which confidence largely inspired by their military services raised them. Hero worship, founded on the noblest feelings in our nature always has, and unless the history of the world since it began shall be reversed and the profession of arms shall lose its prestige, always will, especially in great crises, make our soldiers potential to our national life, not merely for defense but in the administration of government."

"When the crucial time shall come, when your country shall need her best, the call will be, not on those who may have latent powers, but on those who have achieved the premiership in their branches of the service. By this I do not mean mere intellectual achievement, but that superiority that is compounded of mental accomplishments and those moral forces which adorned the characters of our great commanders. What is mere brilliancy for enduring fame. Who would place Marlborough beside the men whose names we cherish?"

"Freedom from self-aggrandisement is an attribute to great souls. While their patriotism did not permit them to decline great offices, yet neither Washington, Lee nor Grant sought preferment. They would lay down rather than voluntarily take up new honors, and nothing more became them than their unaffected modesty. General Lee tendered his resignation to Mr. Davis, saying that he should be succeeded by a younger and abler man."

"Integrity irreproachable, as 'pure as the fellee that hangs from Diana's temple,' has been the unchallenged and unchallengeable possession of all our great generals. There seems—I trust that it is but a semblance—to be a breaking down in many directions of the high standards of personal honesty. I do not believe that any class of our citizens has more generally and consistently kept their honor unimpeached than the officers of our army and navy. Yet in these days when all men's motives are questioned, things without intrinsic wrong must be shunned if they furnish room for evil interpretation. While this state of the public mind is an eruption of our times, neither it nor the safe guards are new in human affairs. 'No man is so great or so good in

No public good, however attractive, is worth gaining at the price of setting aside a fundamental principle of government. This is substituting a government of men for a government of law, and this is the beginning of the end of the republic.
